a time, and then started off to summon the neighboring farmers to assist them in stopping it. About an hour later they were reinforced by about a hundred men and boys; but the question was to get the horses apart, and who would go into the barroyard to do it. At length the lassos were made, and the two animals mere captured and led away.

Both stallions were badly, but not fatally injured. Both were covered with cuts and bruises. Gold King seems to have suffered the greatest injury, his legs being frightfully gashed. The Chief suffered more from the teeth of his opponent than from the feet, long stripe of flesh being torn from his sides. Both horses even after they had been put into their stalls, continued to utter cries of
